The increasing availability of data alongside digital transformation and technological advancements is leading to a paradigm shift in how managerial decisions are defined and implemented and how they contribute to achieve public policies targets. This impact is particularly relevant for knowledge-intensive organizations (KIOs), such as healthcare organizations and higher education institutions, characterized by their heavy reliance on professional expertise and standards.

New digital technologies and big data might enable KIOs to analyse data at an unprecedented scale and speed, providing real-time insights and predictive analytics. This capability not only enhances operational efficiency but also enables proactive identification of patterns, trends, and cause-and-effect relationships between phenomena, simulations on impact of managerial decisions facilitating more evidence-based and effective decision-making, and the performance management.

However, managing and interpreting big data as well as using technological innovations poses significant challenges. KIOs must address concerns related to data privacy, cybersecurity, sustainability, diversity management, and ethical implications. Additionally, there is a need for investment in infrastructure, resources, and skills to effectively leverage big data capabilities and the use of new digital technologies.

Therefore, this research project aims to investigate how the decision-making and performance management of KIOs are changing in light of digital transformation, by emphasizing the opportunities as well as challenges that these new digital technologies ultimately raise.
