ART. 6 - RESEARCH ACTIVITIES

The Fellowship implies carrying out the activities briefly mentioned below at Dipartimento di Filosofia dell'Università degli Studi di Milano and under the supervision of Prof. Di Bella Stefano within the research programme "Parts and Wholes. Mereological Models in Early Modern Philosophical and Scientific Thinking from Descartes to Kant", of the following research program and its specific aims:

Mereology has received growing attention in the fields of metaphysics and formal ontology in the last decades; its different interpretations and applications to various philosophical issues have been intensively debated. Relatively less explored has been the presence of mereological topics in the history of philosophy - especially as far as the early modern period is concerned - and the possibility of employing mereological tools in the study of past philosophical theories. Still, it seems that a mereological approach might offer a fresh and promising look on many theories and debates in early modern philosophy.

The relevance of mereological concepts and problems emerges, first of all, in relation to the great debates on the foundations of physics and mathematics in the age of scientific revolution and the invention of calculus - in particular the discussions on the "labyrinth of continuum" and the divisibility of matter, with their impact on the working out of an ontology of material objects, going from the ancient hylomorphic models to the new atomist or monadological solutions.

At least in the case of Leibniz, then, all these and other researches in several regional fields found a counterpart in the attempt of working out a general, (semi-) formal mereological theory, aiming also at the implementation of calculi, and the heritage of this approach continued in later similar projects of regional or semi-formal ontologies.

Besides this, new attention has been devoted in recent years to the sciences of life in the context of seventeenth century scientific revolution. These researches focused, again, on the ontological status of these special material objects which are the living beings, and in particular on their difference with respect to artifacts and on the problem of rethinking the concept of organism within a mechanistic framework. Also in this case, the application of mereological concepts - having also regard to the temporal dimension - turns out to be very promising in order to map and assess the viable alternatives and solutions.

The research activities are reported here:

1. Working out and implementation of one of the possible lines of research within the general project, with the aim of giving an original contribution with respect to the updated state of the art of the international research in the field;
2. Publication of papers on international scientific reviews, also in view of a possible monographic work;
3. Organization of seminars or workshops on the topics of the project;
4. Organization of a final conference.
